To whom it may concern:

9/10/15

I Rocio Lara mother of Alexis Lara am writing this letter do to Alexis being able to have the opportunity to play soccer this school year. Soccer is his passion that is the number 1 sport that he can play and have a meaning to him. Alexis is an awesome young man and very inelegant but started to make bad choices and started to hang out with bad friends there for it led him to get himself in trouble. Alexis also stopped talking to his dad his choice. His dad lives in Texas we have been divorced 7 years now and that's when me and my children moved to Salem Oregon. Alexis is currently in counseling and will be exiting in 9/18/15 counseling has really help him turn things around for the best in which he now has goals and one of them is to finish his senior year and graduate and continue his education. I love the fact that Alexis and I have an open communication and able to talk about just anything, being able to participate in his counseling we both see things differently and be supportive. Therefore I would like for you to please reconsider and give Alexis the opportunity to participate and play soccer this year. Thank you for your time.

Sincerely: Rocio Lara

Hardship letter

Everyone has an outlet for all the negative energy we store up. To get loose and let some of that stress out. For me that outlet is soccer. When I have a ball at my feet nothing else matters. Being able to work and communicate with teammates helps me be socially active. Over the past year I began to steer away from that due to being around the wrong people. I began to disrespect my team and family. I wasn't taking school serious and I began to skip classes. I have gone through the consequences of my actions. I saw the terrible habits I acquired and am now trying to get back on track.

Over the course of the last year I began to hang around the wrong crowd and make poor choices. There was some drug use and drinking late at night. I went away from soccer. I gave up coaching and playing. I had noticed a big difference in what I prioritized in my life. For me being able to play the game and win for my school is better than anything else I have experienced. I got back into soccer because an old friend had begun to mentor me. He and I went out and played every morning over the summer and that's when I realized what I was missing out on.

However, even after I got back it seemed to me as if no one else on my team took the game as serious as I did. They would goof off during practices and joke around. I practice how I play. I don't really have time to joke around at practices. I had even disrespected my family. I didn't communicate with my mom and left whenever I wanted to. I'd fight with my sisters and not care if they were mad. I was in a "I'll do what I want" sort of mind set. I could see this beginning to bring me down again.

One of my main goals in life is to graduate high school and then graduate college. The choices I had been making, and the actions I did weren't getting me anywhere near my goal. I was beginning to fail classes and skip class a lot. I had teachers and even my counselors pull me aside and talk to me. They knew something was wrong and told me that I wasn't acting like the educated student they knew. I brushed it off saying I was fine, even though I knew inside I was holding in a lot of tension. They always saw me as the student that got his work done and could rely on me to be productive. I guess it's pretty easy to notice somethings off when I don't go to their class, but they see me in the halls.

This year I am at a new school. New start. I've overcome my obstacles and jumped through my hurdles. I am now striving to become the best I can be both on the field and in the classrooms. I am determined to graduate on time and move on to college. I've set goals for myself now and am attending counseling. For me counseling was one of the best things that could have happened to me. I now am able to reduce my stress and now respect my family as a whole. I am challenging myself this year taking college writing and hoping it will get me further. I am now back on track to graduate and am feeling a lot more positive than I have ever felt.
